To have the barber cut beys' hair was hardly thought of then. You recollect how father used to sit you on a stool—an apron hanging from your neck; ma's scissors as the tool? You recollect how, on your hand, he placed the sugar bowl, while mund its edges, snip by snip, the susors deftly stole? There were no conted lotions then to pour upon har head; no tonics, rubs and danderff cures and other things we droad. But merely trimmed the edges off to be stool? You knew that could be stool? You knew that the stool it. In thirty years, it seems to me, the world has changed a heap. The stool of the stool? You knew that the stool it is not the stool of the stool? Don't go to the woods."

A grunt or two came from Brother Bacon's Adventure.

One of Porky Pig's grandchildren wanted to have an adventure.

He was tired of the stream where some of the pigs had been which meant both a goodby and that he'd do as he pleased. For Brother Bacon was far from being an obedient son. And when his mother had grunted into her pink ear how very, very sorry he was he had said there were dangers in the would he go where there were warded to find them.

The little pig grandchild had been fine name, and hadn't the least idea
